Tuesday, June 3, 2003 - 10:00 AM

One cannot easily find his own way in this troubled world. Man is destabilized by too many pieces of contradictory information, and he manages to find his own way around with difficulty. The bustle and the many sorts of nuisance are a hindrance to personal research, which requires a minimum of calm and attention. Everything inclines him to get diverted away from his real nature instead of developing it. Happy is the man who can live in peace, far from the noise of the cities and the daily worries of a hectic life. It is all the more commendable to manage to organize it and to devote some time to a practice allowing him to discover his true nature. It is for him, the way toward liberation. His quest will be successful and as his inner being knows, it encourages him to keep going when his motivation weakens. It is not easy for everyone to set aside a time slot, and to devote oneself to this kind of discipline, which requires unfailing perseverance.

"Only the worthwhile quest warrants the required efforts. The time will come when the researcher will be able to tell the difference between the necessary and the luxurious. Our convinced candidates can put things in perspective. There is no need to press them to perform what has become an absolute necessity to me. We are delighted to see them progressing and finding a satisfactory balance in a world which is wallowing in unbridled materialism. May the divine light succeed in transforming it."

Babuji