Whispers from The Brighter World

Monday, January 17, 2000 – 8:00 a.m.

You are all similar as human beings, you are born, you live and you leave this Earth. You are neither superior nor inferior to anyone else. You are incarnated according to the will of the Creator, and you must do what you came here for. The main thing is to do the job well by accomplishing exactly what is programmed. To make a success of one's incarnation is commendable, try to apply yourselves to that; you will then be able to leave in peace for other horizons. Life is an eternal restarting that can seem tiresome; tragedies and joys punctuate it in turn. By setting yourselves goals to achieve, you give it meaning, with varying degrees of motivation driving you forward.

It is the best engine able to propel you out of monotony.

Become adults, by really growing up. Some of you remain children all your lives. Keeping the enthusiasm, the freshness of the soul of childhood is well and good, but it is the adult in all its maturity that must act and express itself to reach the end of its Earthly journey.
